“ I knew Clint from the old Viking days - he had an office space near the computer room, and I was a computer programmer at that time. When I think back remembering those times, I don't recall him ever being upset or angry. He was always such a good-natured, pleasant fellow who always had that impish grin from a joke he'd heard and wanted to share.

After the Viking days, I would occasionally run into him out-and-about in town shopping somewhere. He would always stop to recognize me, greet me, and we would swap stories about our lives and families...it was a highlight of my day. I'm going to miss running into him around town, but I'm grateful that I had the opportunity to know him and appreciate not only his skill at his job, but also the kind and gentle person that I knew.
